The Newcastle armorial formerly known as the Boroughbridge roll of arms

Introduction

One of the first armorials to appear in print was the small compilation traditionally known as the Boroughbridge Rolls of Arms named for the battle fought on March 16, 1322 on the crossing of the river Ure in Yorkshire between 'contrarians' or insurgents adhering to Henry Plantagenet D.Lancaster and a force loyal to King Edward II. As discussed below, the name came naturally as the compilation was written on the dorse of a scroll with several dated writs concerning the insurrection on the front and a list of men proscribed following the list of names and blazoned arms.

Over the years it became evident that a number of items were in conflict with the traditional attribution. In 2013 the armorial was thoroughly re-evaluated by Bridget Wells-Furby in an eleven-page paper and persuasively argued to relate to an improvised, and not otherwise known, tournament held in September 1319 at Newcastle shortly before the host collected there on July 22 moved to Berwick for a short inglorious siege from 7-17 September.

The present edition should be read in connection with her paper, which sets out the arguments and evidence in detail. She mentions about half of the 214 men listed in the armorial, and for their attendance or non-presence at Newcastle and Boroughbridge references must be sought in her paper. Here they are mentioned with Wells-Furby BR first among the references.

As a result of her investigation, Bridget Wells- Furby proposed to rename the armorial for the place of the tournament, a suggestion followed above in the hope of ending any confusion on the issue.

Manuscripts, printed copies and comments

The present edition has the arms blazoned in modern terms, except where the wording is difficult to comprehend. The names and descriptions of arms are mainly based on Palgrave's transcription from the principal manuscript, London, British Library, Egerton 2850, a vellum scroll of 18 x 292 cm in contemporary hands with copies of royal writs sent to the sheriff of Nottinghamshire concerning the rebellion led by Thomas E.Lancaster, and his trial and execution on March 22, 1322. The armorial is blazoned on the dorse followed by a list of names of men proscribed or who died in the battle of Boroughbridge, a crossing on the river Ure in Yorkshire.¹ The top of the scroll is missing, so that a number of participants are lost. Around 1600 two copies were made by members of the College of Arms. The first, presently Oxford, Bodleian, Ashmole 831, ff.100r-106v, has all items tricked by Ralph Brooke (1553-1625, York Herald. The second, presently Oxford, Bodleian, Rawlinson B.102, ff.103v-104v, blazoned by John Guillim (c.1565-1521, Rouge Croix Pursuivant, omits O:1-19.

Of the three modern transcriptions, the oldest, in Norman-French, was included by F.T. Palgrave (1788-1861) in Parliamentary Writs, vol. II, Appendix, pp.196-201, London 1830, incl. the list of proscribed. Palgrave noted the special signs indicating leaders.² The one printed in The Genealogist, New Series, 1884, 1:51-54, 117-121, 1885, 2:30-31, 98-103, was a translation into English with an introduction and an index by James GreenStreet. The third was printed in proof only c.1903 for Oswald Barron and W.St.J. Hope, and is now at the Society of Antiquaries in London. A selection of blazons was reproduced in Joseph Foster: Some Feudal Coats of Arms, London 1902, p. xxvi (O:25-62), and xxviii (O:131-161).

The manuscript was described and commented in the Catalogue of Additions to the Manuscripts in the British Museum in the years 1900-1905, London 1907, p. 391, now revised in the British Library on-line manuscripts catalogue for Eg.2850 in four paragraphs essentially retelling CEMRA.³ The first names it as the Boroughbridge Roll, the second (no.1) concerns the writs and their copies in other sources, the third (no.2) gives it as names on the loyalists' side, the fourth (no.3) introduces the proscribed.

Vicary Gibbs wrote a paper on it in The Genealogist, New Series, 21:222-226, reprinted as Appendix C in GEC 2:597-602. His paper is the first to criticize the presumed association between the armorial and the battle. Gibbs listed 46 peers and knights of the contrariants and 21 loyalists, most of which were not in the armorial, with comments on members of the peerage.

Last, but not least, Bridget Wells-Furby re-evaluated literature, sources and entries in the armorial. Apart from Gibbs and his notes on contrariants included in the armorial, as mentioned above, her starting points was that two prominent names, Nicholas Segrave (O:21, d.1321) and Gerard Salveyn (O:118, d.1320), were dead long before the battle, and that another 12 names were absent from the battle due to being in custody at the time.⁴ Her search for an alternative occasion for the collation of names and arms quickly centred on an abortive Scottish campaign of 1319. The feudal host was summoned to be at Newcastle-upon-Tyne on July 22 before moving north towards the first stop, the repossession of the fortified town of Berwick. After less than two weeks of siege, Edward II abandoned the campaign on September 17. Many in the host were probably becoming restless after some six weeks of waiting in a northern summer, so a game of mock battle would be a welcome break of boredom. Such is her argument, only supported by some similarities with one of the English tournament armorials, the Second Dunstable of 1334, from early in the reign of Edward III.⁵ On the positive side, she could place half the names as present or probably present at the proposed event. In contrast, none of the parties were led by the top magnate known to have participated in the campaign, and few of the men stayed in the retinues most likely for their known contracts. Her solution, agreed to by the present editor, was to claim it as a hastily organized event staged as the host made ready to move, so that men and horses could exercise their muscles before any real action. Those able to engaged with friends and acquaintances, others simply joined parties or the commune. No attempt was made to partition the list into 'them' and 'theirs'. Most of the leaders were minor bannerets and magnates, while the knights chose a temporary allegiance or simply banded together for the fun of it. Except for two Frenchmen, all were Englishmen gathered from all over the country. One (O:7, ?Ladevèze) was probably a minor Gascon gentleman, who had accompanied an official back to England, the other (O:87, Moreuil) was a cadet, possibly John, the younger son of Bertram S.Moreuil (d.1302), who served Edward I in the Scottish campaigns.

The nearest armorials to compare with are the Parliamentary (N, c.1310), First Dunstable (L, 1309), Second Dunstable (SD, c.1334), Ashmolean (AS, c.1334) and its clone Cooke's Ordinary (CKO, c.1334//40).⁶ Several names and arms may be present in these.

Reign, tournament and battle

The reign of Edward II, 1284-1326, was dominated by his favourites and the nobles' antipathy to them from 1307, when he succeeded his father, to the end, when he was deposed, imprisoned and murdered at the age of 42.⁷ Edward II never reached the military or political capability of his martial father. Scotland was always a big headache. Edward I died on his way to quell the insurrection of Robert Bruce, and the two major expeditions on 1310 and 1314 failed, the last disastrously, at Bannockburn outside Stirling Castle. In the meantime, northern England was raided by Scots deep into Yorkshire. In April 1318 Berwick, one of the last fortified towns on the border, was taken by James Douglas. In response a host was summoned to Newcastle in July 1319 to retake it. Edward II arrived late, and the campaign was abandoned after only a short ineffective siege. That local levies defeated a Scottish raiding party on Myton-on-Swale did not influence the failure. The armed insurrection of late winter 1322 by Lancaster and Hereford was quelled at Boroughbridge in Yorkshire by a largely local force commanded by Andrew Harclay, who was created E.Carlisle in reward, the name chosen for his earlier defence of that town against the Scots.⁸ In the autumn of 1322 Edward II led yet another abortive campaign in the north and was defeated at Byland Abbey. Several more or less effective truces lasted until a peace treaty was signed in 1328 by the regency of Edward III.

The first of his two major favourites was Piers Gaveston, a poitevin, who came to England with his father and was raised with Prince Edward. At his accession Edward II created him E.Cornwall, gave him a rich marriage to Margaret de Clare and much land formerly belonging to Redvers E.Devon and de Forz C.Aumale. Neither the intimate friendship, his newly acquired riches and semi-royal title, his personal behavior, nor his prowess at the lists made Gaveston liked by the native magnates. After a failed attempt, his political enemies (the contrarians) collected an army, defeated, captured and executed Gaveston in 1312. This was largely done under cover of going to tournaments, and as a consequence such activities were largely prohibited from 1312-23.

The second set of favourites was the two Hugh Despencers.⁹ The elder Hugh (1260/61-1326) served Edward I as a soldier and diplomat, being summoned as a baron in 1295 and getting several offices. He married Isabel, daughter of William Beauchamp E.Warwick. Their son, Hugh Jr (d.1326) was probably born around 1288, being knighted in 1306 by the then Prince of Wales. He too made a good marriage to Eleanor Clare, later senior coheir of the E.Gloucester. Hugh Sr continued in the service of Edward II, being one of the few barons to support him against the contrarians both in regard to Gaveston, (and he was) rewarded and created E.Winchester in 1322. Hugh Jr soon became a close companion to Edward II as his chamberlain from 1313 after the fall of Gaveston and summoned as a baron in 1314. Both had periods of disgrace when the contrarians wielded power, staying abroad for most of 1318-21. Their influence (and lives) stopped only when the contrarians regrouped and was reinforced in 1326 by barons formerly neutral, but now led by ⁸ A list of contrariant barons is given by Vicary Gibbs in GEC 2:597-603, App.C, with his critique of the naming of the armorial.

⁹ GEC 4:259-295 Despencer.

Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, then lover of the French-born queen, Isabel. Edward II fled to Wales, surrendered with his few adherents, was imprisoned and murdered, while the Despensers were hanged. A regency council led by Isabel and Mortimer ruled until Edward III staged a coup and began his personal rule in 1330.

The earls, the tip of the nobility, may be divided into two groups: Members of the royal family and barons elevated to titled nobility. The king's younger brothers Thomas of Brotherton (1300-1338) created E.Norfolk 1316, and Edmund of Woodstock (1301-1330) created E.Kent 1321; and his cousin Thomas Plantagenet E.Lancaster (1278-1322), the leader of the contrarians. Henry S.Monmouth (1281-1345), younger brother of Thomas and by 1324 his successor as earl. Aymer de Valence (d.1324) created E.Pembroke 1307 was a relative of the queen of Henry III. Gilbert de Clare E.Gloucester died in the disaster at Bannockburn 1314, leaving Humphrey de Bohun (1276-1322) E.Hereford as the second leader of the contrarians to die in the battle. The remaining earls were Edmund FitzAlan (1285-1326) E.Arundel, who married Alice de Warenne, heiress to the earldom of Surrey; Robert de Vere (-1331) E.Oxford; Guy Beauchamp (d.1316) E.Warwick and his son Thomas (d.1369); Richard de Burgh (1259-1326) E.Ulster; and the largely titular John of Brittany (d.1334), who succeeded to be the largely titular E.Richmond in 1312.

There were too many barons to list them here. Few are named in the armorial, but like several of the knights included, many, like Thomas Coudray (O:1), had campaigned in Scotland for 25 years, taken part in tournaments, and were not altogether satisfied with the prevailing state of affairs. Other entries mention men of local stature, sheriffs, shire knights, judges, and keepers of castles. Notably many rebels were summoned to a Great Council at Westminster on May 9, 1324.

The muster of 1319 was a rare occasion, where contrarians joined the host in person. Many had previously ignored summonses or sent as few substitutes as possible.¹⁰ The improvised tournament was probably of the melée type and held on or shortly after the knighting of Richard Talbot (O:6) on September 1, in time for the host to move the 100 km north and begin the siege on the 7, as proposed by Bridget Wells-Furby.

 John Cromwell, o.s.p.m.1335, baron 1308, banneret, king's knight, steward of the household 1316, rebel 1322, pardoned, appointed admiral 1324, was a younger son of Ralph Cromwell of Cromwell (d.1289), who held Arnold in Notts. He married Idoine Vipont, widow of Roger Leybourne (d.1284) and younger daughter and coheir of Robert Vipont (d.1264) of Westmoreland.
 The blazon has an uncertain meaning as noted by G.J. Brault, but John used several coats of arms during his career. The paternal arms were {Ar bend Gu & chief Az}, while for the scottish campaigns 1294-1300 {Az lion crowned Ar}, possibly from his war associate Roger Mohaut was used in GA:82, and after his marriage, he used the Vipont arms {Gu 6 roundels Or}, e.g. in AS:164.

 Walter Pavely jr, possibly d.1323, as younger son of Walter sr and Maud Burghersh, father of Walter (1319-1375/79, KG 1348).
 There is much confusion among the Pavely families with lands in Wilts, Kent, Som and Dorset. One of the possible descendencies has Walter (c.1250-1323), as 31 in 1280, when he got livery of Westbury (Wilts), active at Boroughbridge in 1322 at the age of 72, and having a son and heir Reginald, loyalist, at council in 1324. The present arms are assigned to him and to Walter (KG 1348, no.26). His son was probably Walter (1342-1380, o.s.p.), husband of Elizabeth, who held the same Burghersh manors as Walter, the KG. None fits easily with the available sources.
